

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

PREFACE.

THE first of the accounts contained in this volume embraces the period from the 6th September 1507, the date on which the last account closed, to the 8th of August 1508. The Treasurer who is responsible for it was the same James Beaton who had been appointed to that office in 1505, and a sketch of whose career was given in the Preface to the last volume.¹ After he demitted office, on his appointment to the Archbishopric of Glasgow in 1509, he was succeeded by George Hepburn, Abbot of Arbroath and Bishop of the Isles; he was a son of Hepburn of Hailes and uncle of the first Earl of Bothwell of that name. He got the Treasurership and his Bishopric in the same year, but almost immediately resigned the former, as he only held the appointment up to some time between the 23rd August and the 1st October 1510.² He ultimately fell with the King at Flodden in 1513. No accounts of his have come down to us, so that there is a blank in the record from the last entry of his predecessor till the first of his successor. On his resignation his place was filled by Andrew Stewart, ¹Vol. iii., p. 2.

²Treas. Accts., vol. i., p. xxxiii.

Bishop of Caithness, Commendator of the Abbeys of Kelso and Fern. He was, according to Craufurd,¹ a natural son of the House of Innermeath, entered the Church—a common destination for illegitimate sons in the days with which we are dealing—and became distinguished, even in a time when such practices were thought little of, by the number of offices which he held.² There are two accounts of his in the present volume—the first covering the period from 25th August 1511 to 14th August in the following year, and the second from the last-mentioned date to the 29th October 1512. There are, however, entries in the former account as early as the 7th August. It is a fairly full and well arranged statement of the income and expenses of the Court, but the second account, which only extends over a few weeks, has been done in a very slovenly way; and at the date on which it comes to an end the Treasurer either resigned office or was dismissed from it. There is some ground for supposing that he did not give satisfaction. His last account contains the “singular and suspicious entry,” as Dr. Burnett observes,³ “that the amount was fixed ‘ad æstimationem,’ according to an estimate, an expression which has not been elsewhere observed, and even this estimate is only arrived at by his taking credit for a payment of £3,333 6s. 8d. to the King, an equally singular entry which does not occur in the account of any other Treasurer." The Bishop did not fall, though he fought, at Flodden; perhaps it would have been better for his memory if he had; he lived till 1518, when he died, practically in a state of bankruptcy, and was buried in the choir of the Cathedral of Dornoch.

¹Officers of State, p. 369.

²For an account of this Bishop, see Exchequer Rolls, xiii., p. cxlvii.

³Exch. Rolls, ut supra.

His successor was Cuthbert Baillie, a cadet of the Lamington family of that name. He was Rector of Sanquhar and Commendator of the Abbey of Glenluce. His only account in this volume is for the short period of a little more than nine months, being audited on the 8th of August 1513. He held office, however, till his death in the following year.

The principal feature in the present accounts is the large number of entries relating to the Navy, in the formation of which the King took such a pride. Not only in the body of the accounts themselves is there much information given concerning it, but in the Appendices at the end of the volume there will be found the detailed accounts of the Master of the Works, who had charge of the shipping, with much interesting matter relating to the building and outfit of the ships, the names and wages of the wrights, seamen, and gunners, the manner in which the vessels were provisioned, and many items regarding the supply of artillery both to the Royal navy and to the army which followed the King to Flodden. Many of these small and comparatively unimportant particulars given in the Appendices bring before us the manner of living and the general condition of the country at the beginning of the 16th century even more vividly than the necessarily mere general references in the main body of the Accounts themselves.

ITINERARY OF THE KING.

When we left the King at the close of the last volume of the Accounts he was on his return home after a hasty journey to the North. He was at Perth on the evening of the 5th September 1507, and in the present volume we find him making his usual offering in the Church of Restalrig on the 9th; the following day he worshipped in the Rood Chapel, an edifice which stood almost half-way between Edinburgh and Leith, but of which no trace now remains. He seems to have been a good deal about this locality at the period, as only three days afterwards there is an entry of five shillings given to four men that rowed in a boat in the loch of Restalrig "to affray fowles," or, in other words, to set up the water-fowl from the surface of the loch in order that they might become the prey of the King's hawks on the land. This Restalrig loch was probably what is now known as Lochend.¹ On the 21st September the Court moved from Edinburgh to Stirling,² and from that point short excursions in the neighbouring district were frequently made. On the 22nd and 23rd the King was at Doune, and on the 29th he was worshipping in the chapel at Bannockburn.³ In the beginning of October there is some discrepancy in the accounts: the account for the Royal alms indicates that at the beginning of the month the King was at the oil well at Liberton and also at Peebles,⁴ but it is possible that his alms at these places were bestowed by deputy, as in the general expense account it is clear that he was at Stirling on the 8th and probably for some days later.⁵ It is likely that he returned to Edinburgh by the middle of the month, for he was at Whitekirk on the 16th and 17th. On the 19th he was at Hailes Castle, the seat of the Earl of Bothwell, whose death must have taken place not long after the date of the Royal visit to his house. On the same evening James was in Dunbar, and on the following day he left that town and went to Cranshaws on a hawking expedition; one of his hawks was lost, but was returned to him some weeks afterwards.⁶ On the 23rd he was in Edinburgh, but on the next day we find him at Stirling, and (notwithstanding an entry of an offering to a priest's first mass in St. Giles, Edinburgh, which was probably done by deputy) he seems to have stayed here for some time, though he must have paid a flying visit to Haddington and the Capital itself from the 15th or 16th to the 19th of the month.¹ On the 20th he was back in Stirling, but on the 27th again in Edinburgh, where he remained till the 13th of December, when he left once more for Stirling. We have no certain knowledge of his movements immediately thereafter, but it is probable that Yule was as usual spent in Edinburgh with the customary festivities.

About the 9th of January 1507-8 the Court made one of its many migrations from Edinburgh to Stirling, and there the remainder of that month was passed in quiet enough fashion, from all that we can gather from the accounts: there was hunting and hawking in the adjacent district: once the loch at Inchaffray appears to have been visited, as there is a payment of three shillings to men for raising herons to hawks from the loch.² Fishing does not seem to have been a sport in which James ever indulged. Many presents of fish were brought to him, but these were probably caught by professional fishermen: he himself was not the sort of person to whom "the contemplative man's recreation" would naturally appeal. The inclement winter days, when outdoor sports were at a discount, were probably employed in chemical experiments with that arch-impostor the Abbot of Tongland. We read of two great caldrons being provided at this time for “quinta assentia,” together with two pipes, which may have been retorts, saltpetre, and other chemicals.¹ The long January nights were devoted as usual to cards, song, and listening to the tales and quips of jesters.

The King was back in Edinburgh by the beginning of February. He developed at this time a practical interest in artillery, and, under the guidance of Hans, his master gunner, practised shooting with a culverin; but this pastime of the King will be more fully dealt with later on.

On the 19th of February James left Edinburgh and proceeded to Stirling, where, however, he only remained till some time during the first week in March.² He then visited Edinburgh, but only for a few days, as he was in Stirling again on the 16th.³ On the 21st we find him at Biggar en route for Whithorn, but without the Queen.⁴ He was at the latter place by the 23rd, but left the same day and proceeded to Kenmure, where he was the guest of Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar; on the 25th he returned by Drumlanrig to Biggar and was home in Edinburgh on the following day. While at Whithorn he presented to the Priory a reliquary costing £17 1s.⁵ By the 9th of April

he was in Stirling once more, and stayed there over a fortnight, going on the 29th to Dunfermline and on the 30th to St. Andrews. From there he ran over to Falkland, where he was on the 2nd of May, and then returned by way of Tillicoultry to Stirling. On the 12th of that month he returned to Edinburgh to welcome the great Lord of Aubigny, who had come to Scotland, having arrived in London on the 21st of March. He was attended by a large retinue, and brought a present of six horses for the King.¹ James was not to be outdone in generosity, and he gave in return to his distinguished guest seven horses with French saddles.² A great tournament was given in his honour; he dined at the same table with the King; but a sad ending to all these functions was at hand. D'Aubigny suddenly took ill, and expired at Corstorphine about the 15th of June in his 61st year. His retinue took their departure by sea towards the end of the month.³

On the 27th June the King went to Pittenweem on board the ship Lion, and the following day he was at Crail and Kilrenny, proceeding from there to St. Andrews. On the 30th of June he paid a visit to the Isle of May to shoot sea-fowl with his culverin, though it is hardly likely that the Royal sportsman shot his birds flying. On the 1st of July the King left the May and proceeded by Pittenween and St. Monance to Kinghorn, where he dined. From there he went to Aberdour, and took a boat to Inchcolm, then a centre of ecclesiastical influence and possessing one of the most interesting abbeys in Scotland. Founded by Alexander I., and richly endowed by pious donors, it had gone through many vicissitudes, but its buildings still bore evidence of its former greatness, though the day was very shortly coming when as a religious house it would be a thing of the past. After spending a night at the abbey the King took boat and crossed the Firth to Leith, and within a very few days we find him settling down, so far as such a restless person could settle down, in Stirling; here he remained for some weeks without taking any long expedition. Some incidents of his daily life are not, however, without a certain amount of interest as showing how he spent his time. On the 4th of July he rode over to Kinneil, an ancient possession of the Hamilton family (still held by its original owners), which had been bestowed on them by King Robert the Bruce. The object of the King's visit was to see the stud of the Earl of Arran: James was, as we have had frequently occasion to note in the course of these Accounts, a great lover of horses, and no doubt his visit was a congenial one: we hear of it in these pages from the fact that his gratuity to the studgroom was five shillings.¹

On the 5th there is an entry of 28s. to an Almayne—a Flemish or German artist “that suld make the Kingis lair in Cambuskenneth in marbill.” We have previously seen that David Prat and his masons were at work in the Abbey building a tomb, apparently constructed of coloured mason-work:² the present entry seems to indicate that a more costly addition was being made to the mausoleum. Perhaps the original work was an architectural canopy, and now it was designed to place a marble altar tomb beneath it. Dr. Laing is of opinion³ that this monument was intended to be erected not in honour of his parents but as a final resting-place for the King himself; but, though the entries in the accounts style it “the King’s lair,” it is doubtful whether this expression does not refer to James III. Considering how the death of his father weighed on James’s conscience all his life, it would not be surprising to find him doing all he could to do honour to the memory of his predecessor on the throne. If, however, it was for himself that he meant it, his intentions were frustrated by his fate, as he lies far from his native soil;⁴ and of the sepulchre so carefully prepared not a trace remains in our day.

¹P. 131.

²Vol.

³Proceedings Soc. Ant., vi., p. 28.

⁴He was buried in the Abbey of Sheen or Richmond.

We have indications that during the course of the month the King was hunting in the forest of Glenartney. This was probably towards the end of the month, as the Queen gave birth to a daughter on the 15th July. The child, however, did not long survive her baptism, but it is rather curious that the occurrence of such an event should have left no trace whatever in these accounts. It is unlikely that James would have been absent from home on such an interesting occasion, and we may suppose that he did not leave his wife till she was on the fair road to recovery. Having satisfied himself that things were going well, he went off on his hunting expedition. He must have been attended by a large retinue, as we read of £5 2s. being distributed among three hundred and six men who were with him at the hunting. As this pay hardly amounted to a shilling each, it may be presumed that they were employed as beaters, or in some such subordinate capacity. Music, without which the King could not get on, was supplied by Lord Fleming's taubronar, who got 14s. for his fee.¹

In the beginning of August James was in Edinburgh arranging for the sending of the young Earl of Moray to join his half-brother, the Bishop of St. Andrews, at the University of Padua,² and after this the account for this period comes to a close with the usual payments to the officials.

It is unfortunate that there is a gap in the accounts at this period, and we cannot take up from this source the story of the King's movements until the month of August 1516. The general history of the period can be briefly stated, and we learn some details as to doings of the Royal household from the Exchequer Rolls. We have seen that he was in Edinburgh in the beginning of August 1508. There are charters dated at Brechin on the 8th of that month, and at Perth on the 28th and 30th,¹ which may point to his having undertaken one of his northern pilgrimages to St. Duthus about this time, probably to return thanks for the Queen's recovery. In September he was in Edinburgh; on the 7th November there is a charter dated at the Priory of Whithorn; on the 4th of December he was at Jedburgh, holding a circuit court, and from there he proceeded to Melrose for the same purpose. It is probable that he then went to Falkland, and Christmas this year was kept at St. Andrews. About the 16th January 1508-9 the King returned to Edinburgh, but went back to St. Andrews on the 9th of February;² on the 8th of March he attended the Parliament in ¹Reg. Mag. Sig.

| ²Acta Parl. Scot., ii., p. 267.

Edinburgh.¹ It is possible he may have visited Whithorn later in the month, as there is a charter dated at Kirkcudbright on the 17th.²

It must have been some weeks after the last-mentioned visit that news came to Scotland of the death of James's father-in-law, Henry VII. of England, which took place at Richmond on the 21st April 1509. The event was an unfortunate one for James, for, as Mr. Tytler remarks, Henry's "caution, command of temper, and earnest desire of peace were excellent checks to the inconsiderate impetuosity of his son-in-law."

The King spent the few following months at Edinburgh and Stirling, but appears to have gone to Darnaway, Inverness, and Tain in the course of the summer.³ On the 20th October Prince Arthur was born, and after a short stay at Stirling the King kept Christmas, as was his usual custom, in Edinburgh. Thereafter he alternated between the Capital and Stirling till after Easter, when he rode with the Queen to St. Duthus by way of Elgin. On the 14th of July 1510 the young Prince died at Edinburgh, and in November the King went to Jedburgh to hold a circuit ayre, at which he dealt out condign punishment to many unruly Borderers, and succeeded in taming the turbulence of that part of the country for some time.⁴

We have very little information about James's movements for some time after this. From the testimony of the charters he would seem, as usual, to have alternated between Edinburgh and Stirling during the whole of the winter ; but as the season advanced he made one of his pilgrimages to Tain, where a charter is dated on the 27th May 1511. The 25th day of August in that year is the nominal date on which the next series of accounts begin, though there are entries in them as early as the 7th of that month. We find the King then in Edinburgh visiting the ship Margaret at Newhaven and bestowing a gratuity on a blind fiddler who was on board. He paid more than one visit to his ships at this time, as there are entries relating to the purchase of plums and "hony peris" at Newhaven in September.¹ On the 28th he went to Stirling by Cambuskenneth.² This was only a flying visit, as we find him at Newhaven again on the 3rd October ; on the 5th he made an offering in the Chapel of St. Mungo at Culross, and another to St. Serf's "fertur" or reliquary. St. Mungo is said by tradition to have been born on the shore of the Forth at Culross and to have been educated and trained by St. Serf, although the story is disbelieved by Dr. Skene.³ Still, these entries show that the belief is an ancient

¹Pp. 309-11.²Pp. 175, 311.³MacGibbon & Ross's Ecclesiastical Architecture of Scotland, ii., 232.

one. The King probably sailed up the Forth on this visit in the ship Margaret, and continued his way to Stirling: the Queen returned in her to Edinburgh,¹ but whether James accompanied her is not clear. He was certainly at Inchcolm on the 10th October² and may have gone out with the fishermen dredging for oysters, as 7s. is paid for those dainties "to fischeraris on the say, quhen the King was in their boit."³ October was spent in Edinburgh and saw the launching of the Great Michael. On one of his walks the King had to pay forfeit to a bride of Leith who met him on the way "and wold have kissit hyme," though one can hardly understand how a man of James's proclivities should have refused so tender a greeting. On the 8th November he went to Stirling for a few days, but passed through Linlithgow on his return on the 13th, giving a gratuity to the masons who were working at the Palace.⁴ The remainder of the year, and Christmas and Yule, were spent at Edinburgh. On the 8th of January 1511-12 a present was given to Rouge Croix Pursuivant, who had come from England with a message from Henry and was now about to set out on his return: with him was sent the Scottish Islay Herald, who got £18 4s. for his expenses.⁵ Rouge Croix was Thomas Hawley, afterwards

Carlisle Herald and Clarenceux King of Arms. The name of the Scottish Herald is not so certain : it may have been Peter Thomson ;¹ but, whoever he was, he was destined in a very few years to have still further dealings with Rouge Croix, both of them being professionally employed by their respective sovereigns immediately before the battle of Flodden.² On the 19th of January we find the French ambassador from Louis receiving a handsome present of silver plate, costing £114, previous to his departure for Denmark, whither he was sent in a ship commanded by William Mure of Leith, accompanied by Nicholas, one of James's master gunners, and the King's Chaplain, Sir Andrew Brounhill.³ A curious entry occurs, too, about this time : a woman of the Blackford, who, as appears from the accounts, was in the habit of supplying the King with poultry and other farm produce for his table, brought four fat capons, for which she received the sum of 28s. ; but she evidently thought she was underpaid, and on her complaint to this effect she got as much again.⁴ In February the King was taking much interest in his ships, and on the 22nd of that month had supper in the Great Michael.¹ A few days afterwards he was turning his attention to surgery, for which he had always a great predilection, and drew two teeth from Kinnaird, his barber, an operation which we should have expected to have been reversed, as the extraction of teeth fell at that period within the province of the barber-surgeon.² On the 21st of March De la Motte, the French ambassador, who had been at the Scottish Court since the 12th, took his departure, receiving a present of £180, the expense of entertaining himself and his retinue during that time amounting to £17 15s. 5d.; an ambassador from the Court of Spain, who left at the same time, got £95, together with a purse which cost 3s., and an English Herald who went with him received a gratuity of £18. The Frenchmen seem to have sailed—or ought to have sailed, for it is not clear whether they actually did do so—from Dumbarton, and the King was certainly there on the 23rd to see them off. They were probably detained some days, as James visited the ship on the 25th, on which day she was towed out by two boats and then got under way.³ The King was in Edinburgh before the end of the month, and on the 31st was at Corstorphine and Kirkliston. Easter was spent at Linlithgow, and on Easter Eve, the 10th of April (though the fact is not directly recorded in the accounts) the Queen gave birth to a son, who was ere long to succeed his father as James V. of Scotland. ¹ An indirect allusion to the Prince's birth, however, is made in an entry on the 14th of April, in which is recorded the dismissal of a nurse "to Brounfeildis wyff that suld have been nurice to the Prince, because scho got her leiff by the Kingis command . . . vij. li."; and on the 19th John Watson, a "surregeane," got £3 16s. for certain "confections," which were probably for the use of the Queen. ² At this time also messengers were received with letters from the Pope and the King of France, and Marchmont and Islay Heralds were despatched, the one to the last-mentioned sovereign, and the other to the Court of England. James made his headquarters at Linlithgow for some time, though he paid short visits to Newhaven to superintend his ship-building. Towards the end of the month he made an expedition to Ayr and Ailsa, six horses being required to carry his baggage, which included crossbows and gunpowder. ³ Whether this expedition was of a warlike nature, perhaps connected with an attack by the cruisers of the English King on a French vessel which ran in for protection to an anchorage off the coast of Ayr,¹ or whether it was merely a sporting excursion to shoot sea-fowl on Ailsa Craig, is not clear. Perhaps it was not of either character, but connected with some communication to the Duke of Albany, as on the 30th of April "Monsieur de Albanies Secretar" was given £36 "as his passage to France." This took place on the coast of Ayr, as we read of a payment to the men of Irvine that brought the King in a boat to land.² The baggage was probably sent on before the King, as on the very day on which we learn of his having been in a boat at Irvine he was also at Hamilton, where he gave 3s. to the bell-ringers, and at Ayr and the Lady Kirk of Kile. On the 3rd of May an excursion was taken by boat to St. Mary Isle, which may have been that islet now called Lady Isle, lying $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Troon. Though there is an entry of drinksilver on the 4th of May to the Abbot of Paisley's masons, the King remained in Ayr for some days after that date. He purchased a cloak and a plaid there.³ He also paid a visit to Ailsa Craig, though for what purpose we do not know, though he must have gone with a considerable retinue, as 42s. was paid for the boat which took him there and conveyed "his fockis" home again. Altogether, his visit seems to have extended over eleven days, and it is interesting to note his expenses while in Ayr, chiefly paid through the Master Cook, an official of some importance in the household. The "gudman" of the King's lodgings got £4 4s. for the time specified, a door-keeper got 3s., and "uther poor servitouris" got 5s. for drink and to "help thair horse." The assistant cooks and maidservants received 7s. between them, and when the Court got back to Linlithgow, on the 11th of May, the Master Cook was paid the sum of £4 14s. 4d. "for present silvir and rewardis," which he had probably disbursed during the King's stay in the west. James remained at Linlithgow till Whitsunday, when he came to Edinburgh. There he received ambassadors from England in the persons of Lord Dacre and Dr. West, the Dean of Windsor, who had been appointed to treat with the King for settling differences.¹ At their departure on the 12th of June they received a very handsome present of silver plate of the value of £121 10s.² Rouge Croix Pursuivant at the same time got £7. Besides the English envoys, De la Motte, the French ambassador, was also in the country endeavouring, and with success, to prevail on James to renew the ancient league with France. Seven shillings was paid for his "herbry," or lodging, in Linlithgow, and some time after “Gelis Fercharis wyff” got £20 2s. 7d. for her expenses in entertaining De la Motte and his servants for the space of twenty three days and a half, the Frenchmen leaving the Scottish coasts on the 7th of July.¹ In all the anxiety and warlike preparations of the period, it is interesting to note that other matters were not entirely lost sight of. Some French sheep seem to have been imported in 1511, and we find a shepherd paid for his labour in keeping them together with the other Royal flocks.² But the dominant note in the accounts at this period is undoubtedly war. Not to speak of the energy with which the building and preparation of ships was carried on, which will be more fully alluded to hereafter, we find messengers sent to various parts of the country with orders for the holding of wappinshaws, or gatherings, for the practice of arms,³ and two emissaries were despatched to the coast—one to Fast Castle and the other to Fife—to “see for Inglis schippis.” This was no idle errand, as Robert Barton, the brother of Andrew, who had been slain in an encounter at sea the year before with the English admiral, brought in thirteen English prizes during this month, so that from this, and from the fact that disturbances were occurring on the Border, it may be seen that the relations between the two countries were already considerably strained.

The two months and a half between 14th August and 24th October 1512 are dealt with in a separate account by the Treasurer, Andrew Stewart, the Bishop of Caithness. This account is not so carefully divided into headings as the others are: the items principally relate to payments to mariners, gunners, and workmen in connection with the repairs of the Royal palaces: there is an interesting entry relating to the working of the lead mines at Wanlockhead in Lanarkshire.¹

The last account in this volume is that of Treasurer Cuthbert Baillie, Commendator of Glenluce, whose statement begins on 24th October 1512, and comes down to 8th August 1513. Though the state of the country was becoming more and more perilous as time went on, we hardly find any reflection of this in the accounts of the Treasurer. On the 18th November and subsequent dates we find payments being made to "the Knycht of Spanze that beris the croce on his breste,"² probably one of the many envoys that came to the Scottish Court at this time. The cross on his breast was probably the emblem of an Order: the Knights of the Orders of Alcantara, Calatrava, and St. Dominic all wore crosses of some sort in their breast. Another envoy is more distinctly mentioned in the person of Octavian Olearius, whom the Pope had sent to James in a vain endeavour to persuade him to desert his ancient ally of France. If Octavian only came to Scotland in November, it is singular to find him disembarking so far north as Aberdeen,¹ but as he remained in the country for several months this may only have been an excursion to that town in order to visit the good old Bishop Elphinstone, who was not destined long to survive his King. Octavian was at all events in Edinburgh by Christmas time, as he got twenty French crowns from the King as a New-Year gift, and he stayed on in the country, hoping against hope that he might yet prevail upon James to fall in with the wishes of the Pope, till the beginning of August, when war between England and Scotland had actually broken out. Not till then have we news of his departure, when he received a present of £90.²

De la Motte, the French ambassador, who, as we have seen, left Scotland in July, returned in November with a ship laden with munitions of war and a quantity of wine.³ In December his servants danced two Morris dances before the King,⁴ and there is evidence in the accounts that even at this inclement period of the year De la Motte himself accompanied the King on a pilgrimage to Whithorn.¹ The Frenchmen in Scotland at this time did not only include the members of the ambassador's suite, but others as well. Not to mention shipwrights and mariners who came to assist the King in the fitting-out of his fleet, we read of at least two goldsmiths of that nationality. Michael, goldsmith, Frenchman, got the sum of £35 8s. paid him for work done during the period of a former account,² and £9 were paid to another goldsmith called Jehan la Rossy, who returned to France in January.³ Native talent in this line was, however, by no means neglected, for we find £12 18s. paid to John Aitkin, a goldsmith in Stirling, for eight rings, which were bestowed as New-Year gifts on the ladies of the Queen's Chamber.⁴ Little domestic matters like these bulk more largely in the accounts at this time than might have been expected. Nothing could be gathered from them that the times were so critical and that a blow was hanging over the kingdom which would shake it to its foundation. Life went on in the King's household very much as it always did. We read of a nurse being dismissed on the 12th of December, and a payment to another, an Irish woman, who tended the young

¹P. 399.

³Lelie's Hist. of Scot., p. 85.

⁴Pp. 399, 400.

¹P. 400.²P. 398.³P. 403.⁴P. 401.

Prince during some infantile illness.¹ The search for the Elixir of Life went on as before under the auspices of the notorious Abbot of Tongland : singers were feed, stray hawks were sought for, and the Royal wardrobes were replenished very much as they had been before. In February 1512-13 a payment of £220 was made to the captain of the French ambassador's ship which had brought the cargo of wine previously mentioned : we are left in doubt whether this large sum was given as a gratuity to the captain or whether it was meant to be in payment for the wine. It seems too large a sum for the former, and yet it was more likely that the envoy would have brought the wine as a present to secure the favour of James than as a mere article of merchandise. This was not, however, the only import of French wines for the King's cellar that was made at this time, for in the November previous a ship had been despatched to Rochelle under the command of William Stirling, and we hear of her arrival with her freight of twenty-one tuns of wine in April : the cost of this quantity, calculating the tun at 252 gallons, would be a little over four shillings a gallon, or about 4d. a pint : in Queen Mary's time prices had risen a little, and Parliament fixed the price of Rochelle wine at 6d. a pint if imported by the western ports, and 2d. more if imported by any eastern port.

¹Pp. 400, 403.

In March there appears at the Scottish Court amid the throng of other ambassadors a messenger bearing letters from O'Donnel, Prince of Connal, probably with reference to a league which was to be entered into with the purpose of creating a diversion in Ireland which might occupy the attention of the English King. It is said, indeed, that O'Donnel himself came to Scotland in person and took the oath of homage to James,¹ and we catch a glimpse of his visit in the accounts; his harper "quhilk past away with him" got a gratuity of £7, and the Earl of Argyll received £50 6s. 8d. for O'Donnel's entertainment while he was in Scotland.² On the 28th of March Forman, the Bishop of Moray, was despatched with Unicorn Herald to France to report the state of affairs, which he did with more ingenuity than honesty. The English ambassadors left in the beginning of April, having failed to come to any amicable understanding with the Scottish Court. In May De la Motte again flashes into Scotland,³ bearing that turquoise ring which the French Queen Anne of Brittany sent to James, with a present of thirteen thousand French crowns, calling him "hir lufe," and praying him that "he wald recompence hir again with sum of his knyghtlie support in hir necessatie, that is to say, that he wald raise his airme and come three fute on Inglis ground for hir sake.”¹ This appeal to the chivalry of James turned the balance, and from that moment the chance of peace was but slight, though on the 24th of May James made one more effort to ward off the hostilities which appeared almost inevitable. In June there was a gathering together of mariners to man the ships, and by the end of the month Henry had invaded France and all hope of peace was gone. In July messengers are sent to various countries “for the congregatioun of our Soverane Lordis legis at Ellem,” a rendezvous which was subsequently altered to the Boroughmuir of Edinburgh. We hear almost nothing of the despatch of the fleet under Arran, which made a very inglorious campaign owing to the incompetency of its commander. Towards the end of the month we hear of an importation of twelve cartful of “harnes” from Denmark. On the 26th the Lyon was despatched to France bearing a message to Henry which rendered war inevitable.² On the 6th of August the Queen went to Linlithgow, and it is not improbable that James accompanied her, and that it was here that he had the mysterious interview in the Church with the blue-gowned and yellow-haired apparition of which Pitscottie tells us, who solemnly warned the King against his proposed expedition. Sir David Lindsay, afterwards Lyon, who told the story himself to Buchanan,¹ and John Inglis, the Marshal, made an attempt to seize the figure, but he “wanischit away and could in no wayis be sen ior comprehendit, bot wanischit away as he had bene ane blink of the sone or ane quhife of the whirlwind, and could no more be seine.” James was “a fey man,” and sought refuge from worry and anxiety by a last pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Duthus.² That is the last we hear in the accounts of the doings of the King before the great tragedy of Flodden unrolled itself, and this part of the Treasurer’s books abruptly closes on the 7th of August with the commonplace entry of £15 for the payment of the blacksmith’s account for shoeing the King’s horses. What followed belongs to history and need not be entered on here. The great fleet so carefully prepared and so fully equipped vanishes we know not whither: the great army sets out for England with the King at its head never to return, and Scotland’s cup of sorrow is filled to the brim.

THE NAVY.

As in the second volume of the Treasurer’s Accounts the King’s marriage was the predominating feature, so in this the preparation of his fleet stands out as the principal object of expenditure. In the last volume we had details about the building of the Margaret and the Treasurer; in this the entries chiefly deal with the construction of what was termed "the great ship" par excellence, and subsequently known as The Great Michael. At what exact time it was actually begun is not clear, but the building must have been well in progress in 1507. Pitscottie says it took "a year and a day," but this must only be taken as a general term denoting a long time. In that portion of the accounts which includes the period from 8th September 1507 to 21st July 1508,¹ Sir William Melville, the Master of Works for the ships, receives for the expenses of construction upwards of £3000. At the same time we read of timber being brought from Darnaway in the ship Raven at a cost of £143; and Robert Barton imported the same commodity from France at a cost of upwards of £500. Quantities of iron were also purchased from various persons, but largely from a Spanish merchant, amounting in all to the value of nearly £350. From Spain also seem to have come two anchors, which were bought for £93 15s.,² and sundry other material was supplied, which brought the total of the account up to £7279, most of which was for shipbuilding, though in this account the work in the Palaces and other buildings is also included.

¹Pp. 44-48.| ²Pp. 48, 127.

In the general accounts of this period we get some interesting notices regarding Scottish shipping. In September 1507 a ship that came from Denmark with the French Herald Montjoy, took the opportunity of laying in a cargo of coal as freight for her return voyage.¹ During the same month the Treasurer, under command of John Barton, was put in commission to convey Alexander Stewart, the young Archbishop of St. Andrews, abroad for his studies—the Provost of the Collegiate Church of Crichton, Thomas Crichton, getting £188 to defray his expenses.² In October a barque which was built at Dumbarton was laden with a cargo of herring, which were probably salted for export.³ The Margaret at this time appears to have been laid up at the Pool of Erth, where the King visited her in February 1507-8;⁴ and a quantity of “harnes”—a term which seems to indicate equipment of various sorts and is not confined to mere defensive armour or trappings—was taken from her in March;⁵ and the hundred spear-heads which were made by the smith at Cambuskenneth were probably designed as part of her outfit. The armourer was also at work preparing a lot of axes, halberts, steel bows, and other arms, which were put on board her in June.⁶ On the 18th of June the Treasurer was commissioned to France with Gavin Dunbar, the Archdeacon of St. Andrews, together with certain Frenchmen, and thirty-six horses. This was an expensive freight; John Barton the captain got £113, and the cost of victualling the ship amounted to £204, while £88 was paid for "boat hires" for the horses, which may imply that they were carried by other ships than the Treasurer. That vessel does not appear to have actually sailed till nearly the end of the month, as we find her lying in Leith Roads on the 27th.¹ At the same time a French ship left with the servants of the Lord of Aubigny on board, but the cost of their provisioning was not nearly so great.

Owing to the break in the accounts, we lose sight of the ships for some time. It is not till September 1511 that we meet with them again: we then find much activity reigning at the Pool of Erth. Three docks were in process of construction, together with stabling for fifty horses, probably used for the carriage of material and victuals to the ships. In June 1512 the ship Lark was docked there, and the barque James, which had been purchased for £65, had a new mast put in her the following month.² The whole expenses for the ships during this period ending in August 1512 amounted to the large sum of £14,327. Part of this sum represents the wages of the mariners, shipwrights, gunners, and other workmen employed about the ships, of which fuller details are given in the account book of the Master of Works which has been discovered, and which will be found in Appendix No. 1. The amount also includes a vast quantity of material supplied for the shipbuilding, and also the cost of conveying the French ambassadors to and from their country. Some special items are interesting as showing the energy displayed in bringing the articles requisite from foreign countries. In 1511 the Pansy brought sixty-three copper¹ pulleys with blocks for the same out of Denmark at a cost of £93. The carting for the year from September 1511. to August 1512 amounted to £135. From Denmark, too, came in April 1512, by the ship Clofars, wood, pitch, and tar; and a large importation of timber was made at the same time from Norway in a ship commanded by Thomas Bannatyne. In May we read of a "galay" being constructed at Glasgow, and in July another ship of the same sort was in process of building at Ay.² A ship also appears to have been bought in France and was sent home laden with planks.³ Whether this was the Trinity mentioned afterwards, which was bought in France at a cost of 525 francs,⁴ is not clear: in the first entry the ship is said to have cost 883 francs, but this may include her freight of planks as well as the vessel herself. "Masts" (meaning large trees) were brought from Lochness, Ross-shire, and Denmark. The rigging for the ships was largely bought in Flanders by James Simpson, a merchant there, who also purchased canvas and other materials on behalf of the King. Some other items of expenses on the ships will also be found in the last set of accounts included in this volume,¹ including a payment to the Master of the Works of £940.

From the detailed accounts in the Appendix already alluded to we get some information about the names of the ships which constituted the Royal Navy and the number of mariners in each. The principal of these was, of course, The Great Michael: in October 1512 her mariners' wages for the month amounted to the sum of £137 10s.; but if we are to believe the description given of her by Pitscottie this cannot have represented anything like her full complement of men. He tells us she had three hundred mariners to sail her, and as their wages averaged about 30s. a month the wage list of the ship when fully manned would have amounted to £450 a month. In addition to the "blue-jackets," we are told that she had six score of gunners and a thousand men of war, besides her captains, skippers, and quartermasters.² The

² Pitscottie i., 251; his account of the ship is probably exaggerated in almost every detail, though it must, on the other hand, be kept in view that Pitscottie must have conversed with many persons who had witnessed the building of the Great Michael.

Accounts provide for 40 mariners in the Margaret and 30 in the James. The "little bark called The Gabriel" was manned by Frenchmen, having ten men and a boy, and was commanded by one Perynot. This was the ship that carried De la Motte, the French ambassador, in his journeys to and from Scotland. It is not clear whether she actually belonged to the Scottish King, but at all events her mariners were paid by him. There was a "little English prize," sometimes called "the cach," with a captain, four men, and a boy: the great boat manned by a skipper, two men, and a boy: the little boat with a similar complement of men; the Spanish Ship, the history of which is uncertain: the little barque of Balyardis': the *bark of Abbeyfield*¹: Chalmer's barque, under the command of Peter Foularton, which had sixty men on board, though these were mostly fighting men and not sailors. We also read, in connection with their victualling, of the barque Mytounne, Captain James Douglas, with 130 men; the Mary, Captain George Lyle; and the Crone, under the command of Thomas Ober. Other ships are mentioned in connection with voyages or shipments of material, but which may not have been used for fighting: such as an English ship sent to Norway, probably for timber, which rejoined in the name of the Merrybuttocks; and the Swallow, which was laden with iron. In addition to these, many ships are referred to under their skipper's name, such as John Barton's barque, and Brounhill's ship, which may possibly refer to vessels already mentioned under their own name.

If, as we are told, James's Navy at its best consisted of sixteen large ships and ten small ones,¹ it is clear that we have not the names of all of them in these Accounts: Dacre, in writing to Henry VIII. in February 1513, mentions that there are at Leith thirteen great ships of three tops, ten small ships, and the "Ship of Lynn," and at Newhaven two great ships, the Margaret and the James. John Carslow, Governor of Norham Castle, in a letter to the Bishop of Durham in September 1512, gives the number of ships with tops at sixteen.² But West, the English ambassador, in writing to Henry on 13th April 1513, says that he saw at Leith only nine or ten small topmen, and none of these fully equipped for war except one little topman of about sixty tons: at Newhaven the Margaret was being fitted out with a maintop, and being caulked and tallowed. A galley about fifty feet long was upon the stocks, in which it was said the King was to journey to and from Stirling.³ But Leith and Newhaven did not exhaust the places at which ships were built or laid up: we have seen that ship-building was carried on at Glasgow, Dumbarton, and Ayr in the West, and in the East men-of-war rode at anchor at the Queensferry, or were laid up and fitted out, if not actually built, still further up the the river Forth at what is variously called in the Accounts the Pool or Pow of Erth, or more shortly the Polertht. It is necessary to consider briefly the places where the ships were constructed.

The Royal Dockyards.—We so often read in the Accounts of the Pool of Erth that it may not be out of place to discuss the locality of a place from which almost all tradition of shipping has passed completely away. Airth is a parish of small extent in the east of Stirlingshire, the village of the name lying eight miles south-east of Stirling; it has a coast-line of six miles along the right bank of the river Forth, which is here about nine furlongs in width. The Pow—a common name in Scotland for any small water, from the Celtic Poll and the Cymric Pwl signifying a pool, ditch, or stagnating stream—is an insignificant rivulet which rises near Bannockburn and falls into the Forth opposite the present town of Kincardine. While of no account to-day, it is possible that its outlet at all events was of more considerable dimensions in the early part of the 16th century. It is indeed certain that at that time the tidal influence of the Forth was felt much farther inland than it now is, much fertile land having been reclaimed from the water since then. About a hundred years ago an anchor was dug up in the lands of Dunmore (formerly Airthbeg), and going back to still earlier times, we are told that "Erthe or Airth was a stronghold in Wallace's day surrounded by 'draw dykes,' the tide probably washing the rock on which the Castle stands, although it is now nearly a mile from the Forth."¹ The lands of the "Powis of Airth" and the Barony of the same name are frequently mentioned in Royal Charters, and on 18th January 1580-1 a grant was made to Alexander Bruce of Airth of a certain bovate of land in Pownaif, with the salmon fishings in the rivers Forth and the Pow of Airth "near that piece of land there called the Dokkis."² In a later charter of 24th December 1597 the Docks are again mentioned with an alias of "The Cruikis," referring in all probability to the windings of the river. That there was salmon fishing with the net ex adverso of the Dokkis in the Pow of Airth shows that the tide must have come up to and beyond this point. In another charter of 14th February 1607 there is mention made of "the lands between the head of the mill-lade called Patrick Hagings' damhead and the Pow, as it comes to the site of the old mill of the said Patrick, called Milnholm." This damhead may be the place marked Higginsneuk in the maps, and probably the Docks lay in a line between it and the old mill. There is also allusion in the last quoted charter to the port, "the Pow, herbrie, and hevin" of Airth, which shows that even at that period there was still accommodation of a sort for ships at the mouth of the Pow of Airth.¹ A personal visit to Airth revealed the fact that traces of the old docks are still in existence, and that fishing boats were built in them within the last hundred years. Owing to the extensive reclamation of land from the Forth, however, the place where these docks were is now at a considerable distance from the river, and a very shallow ditch is all that remains of the Pow at this place—the mouth of the present stream of that name entering the Forth about half-a-mile farther east.

¹Family Records of the Bruces and the Comyns by Mrs. E. Cumming-Bruce, p. 313.

²Reg. Mag. Sig.

The Polerth docks being within easy reach of Stirling, it was natural that their oversight should be entrusted to some one at that place; and accordingly we find that the Constable of Stirling Castle was placed in charge of the ships there. In September 1511 he got payment of £60 as a final instalment of £240 for the construction of three docks and the erection of stabling for fifty horses. These docks must have been dug out of the alluvial soil at the river side: cross timbers and blocks must then have been laid on the ground on to which the ship which was to be repaired was floated at high water. The entry must then have been closed with puddle: there are several entries relating to "clay barges,"¹ which were probably used for carrying the clay to the docks, and the "hadder" or heather mentioned in connection with them may have been for the purpose of rendering the clay stiffer and easier to work. The dock having been sealed up with the clay it was kept dry by the use of "scowpis" for bailing out the water.² Of course, when the ship was again ready for sea the only way to get her out was by "castin" the dock again—that is, by digging away the dam of clay and giving the water admittance. This class of dock is used in China to this day for the building and repairing of junks: there they drive in piles to close the entrance, and put puddle inside to make it watertight.

In 1512 Callander is paid sums amounting to upwards of £145 for providing meat, drink, coals, candles, and carriage for the workmen in the docks,³ and in the Exchequer Rolls there occurs a payment to him of £40 in July 1512 for his expenses incurred at the Pow of Erth "circa custodium navium domini regis ibidem existentium," and a similar payment the next year.⁴ In 1512, too, the Treasurer's accounts contain an entry for the payment to him of a sum of £37 for work in the ship

James "when she lay in the Powis of Arth." In March 1512-13 Robert Callander and his wife got a lease of nine bovates of land in the Halls of Airth which had been previously let to Alexander Elphinston with consent of the latter.² We also learn that he received £10 in part payment of £20 for the construction of a dock to the great ship, but if he contracted for this work to be done at Airth it must only have been for the fitting out of the Great Michael, as we know that she was built at Newhaven.

Newhaven.—It was, in fact, at Newhaven that the great bulk of the shipbuilding was carried on. Its proximity to Edinburgh and the consequent convenience of being able to get stores from the town and artillery from the Castle put easily on board made it a most suitable place for a Royal Dockyard. The depth of water also at the shore formed an important consideration in its selection. There does not seem to have been a harbour or even a village of any sort near the place until it was fixed upon as the site of his shipbuilding docks by James. We have already seen³ that so far back as 1504 the construction of the Haven was being proceeded with, and that the building of a Chapel dedicated to the Virgin and

St. James was going on in 1505¹; this Chapel was completed by the beginning of 1507.² In 1510 the City of Edinburgh, fearing, we are told,³ that this new port might prove prejudicial to their own at Leith, got a grant of it from the King: the charter, which is dated at Stirling of March 1510-11, describes it as "the new Haven lately constructed by the King on the sea shore between the Chapel of St. Nicholas in the north part of the town of Leith and the lands of Wardie." The possession of it by the town of Edinburgh did not, however, interfere with its use as a place for the construction of the King's vessels: and the docks excavated for this purpose must have been of considerable extent, as the Great Michael was built there, and its size must have required a dock of very considerable dimensions.

The Great Michael.—Much has been written about this great effort of James's naval constructor, who was probably that Frenchman Jacques Terrel about whom we read so much in the accounts. The most detailed description we get of her is from Pitscottie, who tells us that she "tuck so mekill timber that scho wastet all the wodes in Fyfe except Falkland wode; by all the tymmer that was gotten out of Norway."⁴ We learn from the accounts that this is rather understated than otherwise, for timber was requisitioned from all parts of Scotland, besides being largely imported from France and other parts of the Continent. If it is the fact that her sides were made of oak ten feet thick it is evidently impossible that Fife, or indeed any other part of Scotland, could have supplied so much of that slow-growing wood, which did not flourish very abundantly in the Scottish Kingdom. It is probable, however, that the old annalist is more graphic than correct in his description of the ship. If her sides were ten feet thick they would have materially interfered with the proper working of her artillery: but there can be little doubt that they were very thick. Nineteen "dakir" of hides were provided "to keip her fra fireing"¹; this implies that the muzzles of the guns did not project beyond the outer line of the port-holes, and that therefore there was a risk of the woodwork being singed when they were discharged: to obviate this the sides of the port-holes were lined with leather. No doubt the cannon were not very long, but even allowing for this, the walls must have been of considerable thickness. If we are to take the wage lists given in Appendix I. as representing her full complement of men she cannot have been anything like so huge as Pitscottie would have us believe. She is said to have been, according to him, 240 feet long by 35 in breadth, and according to the chronicler whom we are following bore six guns on each side and three "basilisks" or large cannon, two at her stern and one in her bows: she had 300 pieces of smaller artillery, including, apparently, cross-bows and long-bows. We get a great deal of detail as to her outfit in the accounts.¹ Much material was brought from the Continent: copper, or rather brass pulleys, besides wood, were imported from Denmark; big guns were got from Flanders; some of the rigging came from France, and some from the Low Countries. It is curious to note that both copper and Cornwall tin were brought to Scotland by way of Antwerp: both of these must have been for use in the gun foundry in Edinburgh Castle, and it is worthy of notice that the tin, weighing 608 lbs., was sent in two pieces; now-a-days it would be in ten or twelve. No less than £49 were paid on "crangilt" or crane dues,—the price paid for the hire of a crane to load this heavy freight at Antwerp.² In May 1512 we find more copper being imported. James Sympson conducts the purchase, lays the copper in the "sellar"—i.e., puts it in store—to await the ships, pays the hire of the store ("sellar maill") and the wages of the workmen for putting it in, defrays the customs duty and the cost of putting the material on board.³ The whole items of this shipment, together with the "gunstanis" and tar which formed part of it, are stated with all the charges in it as clearly as any shipbroker could do to-day.

Attention may also be directed to an interesting journey made at this time (May 1512) by George Paterson to Middleburg to procure compasses for the ships.

It is impossible to go into all the details regarding the stores and tackle which were furnished for the Great Michael and the other ships, but one or two other interesting items may be briefly mentioned. When the Cloffas went to Denmark for tar she was ballasted with salt from Dysart, which probably had a ready sale at her port of destination. The great ship, whatever her actual size may have been, must have made an imposing show with all her flags flying. They must have been very large and fine flags: there is a detailed account of the material used in them on p. 477. As it took twenty-two ells of cloth to make the St. Andrew's Cross alone on one of them, it must have been of an immense size. On the Margaret, on the other hand, we find the same Cross took $2\frac{3}{4}$ ells only.¹ The main standard of the great ship (that probably with the Royal Arms on it) consumed 33 ells of lining, and all the flags seem to have been decorated with fringes round their edges. The total cost of the standards for the Great Michael amounted to upwards of £72. Some of the standards were certainly painted, as Andrew

¹P. 297.

Chalmers, the painter, was employed in connection with them; and we have accounts for gold colours, oil, and varnish for them.¹

It is not very clear when the Great Michael was actually launched, but if we are to understand the expression "the out-putting of the King's great ship" as referring to that incident, it must have occurred on the 12th October 1511, three Scottish trumpeters getting a gratuity of 14s. on the occasion²: on the 24th of the same month the taubronar of the Incorporation of Bakers received 3s. for playing at the "drawing" of the great ship; and on the 7th of February following we have an entry of 14s. to the workmen of the Newhaven "for drawan furtht of ane tree fra the cradill of the gret schip," which seems to indicate that even then she was not out of the hands of her builders. She got certain "treis" from Culross on the 13th of that month, and on the same day an accident happened to one of the workmen on board which shows that there was still work proceeding on her. On the 18th, 28s. were given to the men that rowed out the great ship, probably meaning that she was towed out to mid-stream. The King at this time paid her frequent visits, and on the 21st February supped on board. Shortly thereafter she sailed up to Queensferry, the King being rowed from her to Blackness on the 20th March, and fish and other provisions were taken on board her at the former place on the 22nd.¹ She may indeed have gone further up the Firth, as a pilot was despatched "to seik the depis and passage to the Polertht"—that is, to explore the channel and see if there were depth enough for the passage of so great a vessel. If she did not get quite up to Polerth she must have got near it, as on the 2nd of June there is a payment for the hire of a boat which carried the King to the great ship from Bo'ness and down again, clearly implying that he went up the Firth to visit her. He goes "down" again from the ship to Queensferry on the 30th of June, and a boat goes to her on the 24th of July from the water of Carron, near the present town of Grangemouth. On the 3rd of August the Queen had supper on board her.

¹P. 295.

Subsequent to the launching of the great ship a good deal of work was done for her, the detail of which will be found in Appendix No. I. Apart from her supply of stores and provisions, we find that so late as March 1513 she was put into dock to have her bottom cleaned. It was probably in the first place blazed with heather to dry it, then the tar was put on with "moppatis," and then a coat of tallow was applied—four barrels were used for the Great Michael at this time—to prevent the adherence of barnacles or the attacks of worm, and perhaps with the idea that it made it sail more easily through the water. It is interesting to note that at this period when the great ship was getting its overhaul there was much activity and bustle in the dockyards. Men were working night and day, or at all events were doing a great deal of "overtime," as may be gathered from the fact that 7d. was spent for "candell in the nycht to them that wrocht."¹ It will be observed that before the ship could get into the dock "stanys" or ballast had to be taken out of her "forschip" in order to trim her to an even keel.

One of the last notices we get of the Great Michael is in July 1513, when she lay with all her guns and equipment complete, but still taking in provisions, "behind the Inche,"—that is, in the lee of Inchkeith.² The entries relating to her close with the fact that on "the day sche salit" she took on board a quantity of fresh meat.³ Of her subsequent history little need be said, and indeed not much is known. It is matter of history that the fleet was sent out under Arran, a most incompetent naval commander. After a foolish attack on the town of Carrickfergus he was superseded by a real sailor, Sir Andrew Wood. But Wood, as Mr. Lang says, came too late, "and the fleet vanishes into fairyland." The Great Michael was, along with the Margaret and James, sent to France, and was purchased by Louis XII. on 2nd April 1514 for 40,000 livres,¹ and Buchanan asserts that she ultimately rotted in the harbour of Brest.

The Mariners, etc.—It is somewhat difficult to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion as to the number of seamen employed on board the fleet. We have, no doubt, many items showing the amount of wages paid in the different months, but these may apply to what may be called the permanent staff. Before the vessels were actually fitted out on a war-footing many more men must have been employed, and we find that so late as June 1513 messengers were sent to Fife, Galloway, Stirlingshire, Clydesdale, East Lothian, and the West and North of Scotland for the purpose of engaging seamen for the ships.² From September 1511 to July 1512 the weekly wages paid amounted to sums varying from £126 to £175. The monthly wages for September 1511 came to £173, and other entries for the same length of time range from £176 to £255.³ When we look at the wage-lists themselves, we find upwards of 300 names entered as mariners of the great ship, but it does not necessarily follow that these were all on board her at one time, for the same names are in many cases found as belonging to the James or Margaret. The probability is that the men were shifted about from ship to ship as was found convenient, and that the full complement was ultimately made up from the men who, as above mentioned, were summoned from all parts of Scotland. The majority of the seamen appear to have been Scotsmen, as might have been expected, and we meet with many familiar names, as Anderson, Bisset, Campbell, Forbes, Gardener, Irvine, Kennedy, Lang, Law, Maitland, Nicholson, Robertson, Sinclair, Thomson, and the like. Some names are not so well known: Hadder may be intended for Adair, and John Ringan probably owed his name to St. Ninian: but Twizocht, Utiler, and Woguhelm are not represented by any modern family. There were several foreigners; Pernot Bawbyn or Babyn, who came to Scotland in June 1513, was a Frenchman; there were several Spaniards, and the gunners, such as Henrich "cutlug" were probably Dutch. But the whole names in the wage-lists given at the end of Appendix No. I. present an interesting study to the student of Scottish personal names. In the lists of the crews it will be observed that neither the spiritual nor physical comfort of the men were unattended to. On board the great ship there were at least two priests, besides the "Prior of St. Andrews," and there is mention in the Margaret of "the Barber," who corresponded to the ship's surgeon of more modern times. Music was provided by the inevitable "taubroner," while we may probably understand the "Maister Compter" to represent the purser.

Provisions.—The ships appear to have been fairly well catered for in the way of rations. As a specimen, we may take Sunday, the 17th day of July, when the Great Michael was lying in Leith Roads with 200 men aboard. On that day she got two fresh marts or oxen, and 600 loaves of fresh bread which were provided by a Dunfermline baker; on Monday she got a mart and a half, and the following day two marts; on Wednesday, which may have been a fast day, 400 fish were sent on board at 40d. a hundred; on Thursday, two marts were supplied; and on Friday, which would be the usual fast day, 400 fish; on Saturday there was a similar supply of fish, and on Sunday, when she sailed out to lie in the lee of Inchkeith, no less than eight marts were put on board, besides six sheep. For liquor to the crew during the week above mentioned there was laid in one last of fresh ale. A last was twelve barrels, each barrel containing twelve gallons. The price of the ale was 20d. per gallon, and the casks in which it was put (or "treis" as they are termed in the accounts) were chiefly new salmon barrels and cost about 26s. a dozen.

Of course, when the Great Michael was fully commissioned and ready for sea the quantity of provisions taken on board was much larger, but as we are not told how long they were supposed to last, it is not possible to calculate how many men she had on board. Not only was the quantity of food greater, but there was considerable variety. Of ale there was no lack, 289 barrels being taken on board: in addition to this, there were 174 barrels of beer: this proves the inaccuracy of the popular notion that beer was not introduced into this country till the Reformation; as a matter of fact, beer was known in the 15th century if not earlier.¹ It was originally imported from Germany, and "beir of Hamburgh" is mentioned in the Exchequer Rolls in 1461;² any made in this country was probably brewed by foreigners. In addition to this ale and beer the Great Michael stowed away 29 tuns of wine. If we calculate the tun at 252 gallons this would make 7,250 gallons, which would be an ample supply for a very considerable time. The wine was brought from France, and we have previously seen that a ship was sent to Rochelle for the purpose of its importation, and a large amount was brought by De la Motte, the French Ambassador, probably as a present for the King. For eatables there was put on board a large quantity of biscuits packed in barrels and covered with canvas. Those biscuits were made of half wheat and half rye, and the same ingredients went to the making of a comestible called "sour breid," though this is generally supposed to have been made of oatmeal.¹ The crew, however, did not altogether depend on biscuits or "sour breid," for there is no doubt baking was done on board, 14s. being provided to the bakers of the ship for clay to make an oven. Some finer victual was also supplied, but not to any great extent, as we read of only three barrels of flour being got, and even this appears to have been an afterthought, as it was "brocht in haist." Six and a half chalders of oatmeal completed the provisioning in the way of breadstuffs. With regard to meat, 200 salt marts and 40 fresh were provided, and four butchers took two days to slay and salt them. Forty "reistit swine," or, as we should say, salt pork, gave a variety to the menu. For fish there were 1,000 "corf keling" or dried cod, "gevin be my Lord Secretar;" 5,300 stock fish "resavit fra the Franchman," besides thirteen barrels salmon, and five lasts of herring. Six hundred eggs were purveyed, 916 "cabbokes" or cheeses, making in all 200 stone of cheese. Forty-two stone of butter in barrels were put on board, and a barrel of honey. There is a curious item of one barrel "pellok," which was probably salted porpoise and esteemed a dainty. It is difficult to know what use was made of half a pound of saffron which cost the large sum of 22s. 6d.; while four pounds of pepper does not seem as if condiments were greatly in demand. For all this victual there were provided sixteen pipes and twenty-four puncheons of fresh water, which we may presume was used more for cooking than drinking.

¹See "On Scots Drink," by W. Cramond, LL.D., p. 6.; Treasurer's Accounts, i. p. ccxii.

²Exch. Rolls, vii., 60.

Such was the provision for the creature comforts of the great ship and her crew: the smaller vessels were similarly furnished in proportion to their size, and from all that we learn from these lists it is tolerably certain that a seaman on board one of His Majesty's ships in the year 1513 was fairly well catered for.

There are many details relating to the equipment of the ships in other respects, but for these reference must be made to the Appendix.

ARTILLERY.¹

Along with the interest which he displayed in the construction of an efficient Navy, James devoted much attention to the production of pieces of heavy ordnance. We have already seen that he himself practised shooting with a hand culverin on several occasions. One was brought home to him by John Barton in 1507,² and we read of the King getting horns for gunpowder,³ one of these being made of silver and gilt.⁴ Besides this, however, there must have been pieces of greater calibre, as we read of great guns being shot in the Abbey close, when 28s. were given to the gunners. These gunners were chiefly foreigners. One at least was French ; “ the French gunner ” gets parti-coloured taffety,¹ and payments to him are elsewhere mentioned.² His wages were £3 10s. per month, which was not quite so much as the Flemish gunners got, but more than the Scotsmen in the same service.³ As his name is never mentioned, it is not certain whether the person who is styled “ the French gunner ” is identical with “ the Franchman that suld mak the gunnis,” to whom a payment of 56s. was made in May 1508. The majority of the foreign gunners were, however, to judge from their names, natives of the Low Countries. Hans, Henryk “ Cutlug,” Wolf, and perhaps others, came from those districts, and trained a staff of Scottish artillerymen, such as Seton, Nicolson, Baillie, Ormiston, &c.,⁴ under them. Cannon, though in use for nearly two hundred years previous to the period with which we are now dealing, had only just begun to be cast in iron, but it is doubtful whether any of the guns mentioned in these accounts were made of that metal unalloyed. It was on the 10th March 1507-8 that Alexander Bow, a potter in Edinburgh, got £5 to buy metal to cast the first gun. It is not clear whether this is intended to refer to a mere hand culverin, with the use of which the King was quite infatuated about this time, or to a piece of heavy ordnance. Certainly big guns were before long proceeded with.

Before dealing with the home product, however, it may be noted that guns of considerable calibre were already in use, as we read of the King himself shooting the guns at Newhaven under the direction of "George the Almane gunner."¹ These guns may have been imported, as others certainly were later,² from Flanders.

In 1508, as above stated, the manufacture of guns appears to have been started at two places, Edinburgh and Stirling. On 10th March 1507-8, Alexander Bow, a potter in Edinburgh, got £5 to buy metal "to cast the first gun with," and between that date and the 28th of the following month he got no less than £65 additional. On the 5th of April a man that made "the form for the gun in the Abbey" got 14s. in drinksilver, and there are frequent entries relating to the manufacture of gunpowder, though this was probably for the King's own culverin, in the practice of which he was at this time much engaged. But we do not have many details of the making of guns in Edinburgh at this period, though later, as we shall see, there was a regular gun foundry in the Castle. It was in Stirling that their manufacture was chiefly carried on. On the 11th of April 1508 a stone of tallow was purchased "to lay on the muld of the gun,"³ and a few days after a gun was carried from Stirling Castle to the potters, probably in order to enable the workmen to fashion a correct mould. On the 28th April we read of wire to bind the mould, and on the same date "the man that makes the gun in Stirling" was given 14s., and large quantities of metal were purchased for the making, amounting to a total value of £11 6s. 8d. As the metal was bought at different rates it is probable that there were different kinds of metal, which points to the guns being made of some kind of bronze alloy. Two guns were made at this casting, and 31s. was paid for iron bands to bind them with. In May there were purchases of wax, rosin, wire, copper, iron, and tallow for the guns, while a man was sent to Dunblane to get a stone of "flokis" or cloth with the nap raised for smoothing the moulds. All did not go well sometimes in the native effort to cast guns, as 42s. was at one time paid to the potter of Stirling for the mould of a gun "that made na stede," from which we may presume that the mould had been faulty, and that the casting was a failure.¹ Foreign aid had to be called in, and on the 20th June "George the Almane gunner" goes to Stirling with two horses for himself and his gear "to the werk for the guns casting." On the 9th of July Alan Cochran, the armourer, was sent from Stirling to Edinburgh to purchase tin for the guns casting: it arrived three days afterwards, so that Alan had lost no time on his errand. The work was proceeded with without delay, 14s. being given to the man that made the furnace to melt the metal in, and a similar sum to the Cambuskenneth smith who assisted in the manufacture.

We hear nothing more of the Stirling guns, and owing to the gap in the accounts it is some years before we can again take up the tale of the formation of James's Scottish artillery. Before coming to that, however, it is interesting to see how the King devoted himself to shooting with the culverin, with all a child's enthusiasm for a new toy. Not only was he, as we have seen, frequently engaged in shooting matches, but he had several guns made for him, and those evidently of very fine quality, at least so far as outward adornment went. The first culverin arrived almost certainly from abroad, as it was brought by a man of John Barton in January 1507-8—its price was high, £14 being paid on 1st of February to Barton for "ane gun to the King."¹ His Majesty was not long in experimenting with his new acquisition, for on the 4th February he is shooting with it in the hall of Holyrood house, Hans the gunner being present to instruct him in the due conduct of the gun. Next day he is able to go outside, and evidently has a match in the garden of Sir George Newton, who was possibly a canon attached to the Abbey of Holyrood—at all events, we meet with a Sir George Newton who was rector of Bedrule in 1504,¹ and he may have got preferment at a later date, if indeed he did not always have his residence in Edinburgh, as the charter in which his name occurs as a witness is dated from that city. In this his first shooting match with the culverin the King lost no less than £4 18s., as was no doubt to be expected, owing to his want of proficiency in the weapon: the next time he indulged in the recreation at the same place, only a few days after, his losses came down to 28s., but they rise again to £3 10s. in his next match, which was with William Douglas, perhaps that Sir William who married the heiress of Glenbervie, and whose descendants ultimately succeeded to the Earldom of Angus. On 15th February the King aspired to greater feats in the way of fire-arms, and three of his artillerymen—Hans, Herwort, and Pierson—superintended affairs while their Royal master shot the great guns in the Abbey Close; whether they were loaded with ball and at what range they were fired we are not informed. About this time we have several notices of gunpowder being made, and Herwort makes “pellokis” for the King’s culverin. The word is usually employed to denote cannon balls of about 20 lbs. weight, but in this instance they must mean much smaller ammunition. On 28th

February 28s. is given for "ane blawing horn to be ane powder horn," a large sum for a very common affair, and in the evening no doubt it was used to load the culverin with which James shot a match against his absurd clerical friend the Abbot of Tongland, when he, as usual, lost. There are notices of several other matches on which we need not dwell, but the King was evidently very proud of his culverin for which he had paid so much. On the 9th of March Selkyrk the cutler gets 28s. for gilding it, and the owner is waxing keen in the new pastime, as on the 13th a great black bag and a great belt are furnished in order to carry the King's gunpowder; on the 18th a silver gilt powder horn is purchased costing in all £2 9s. 2d., a large expenditure, seeing that neither the ordinary "blawing horn" nor the great black bag can have been worn out, if indeed they had been worn at all. The next time the King shot the big guns was at Newhaven in the beginning of April 1508, where he would have better scope for practice than in the Abbey Close. This did not detract from his devotion to his culverin, however, and he appears to have tried one of native manufacture, as on the 27th April Sir James Pettigrew was paid £10 for making a culverin to the King; this was rather cheaper than the foreign one he had previously purchased. We get an instructive glimpse of the conditions under which the King's shooting matches were conducted by an entry on 28th

April for six ells of canvas “quhilk the King schot gunnis at,” that is to say, the firing evidently took place at canvas targets. But after a very few months’ practice James felt that he could do something better than merely shoot at a mark for a wager, and accordingly we find him out with his keeper at Falkland early in May “to stalk ane deer with the culveryn.” It is tantalising that we are not informed of the result of this stalk; nor are we in any better position as regards another occasion when James made one of a merry party embarked in rowing boats off the Isle of May “to schuit at fowlis with the culveryn.” This expedition did not take place till the end of June, when the stormy waters of the Forth were probably on their best behaviour for the sporting occupants of the “row botes.”¹ Although we have no account of the total bag on either of these occasions, the King does not appear to have been dissatisfied with the performance of his gun, as in the beginning of July he ordered two new culverins.² These made at least five which had been got since the beginning of February. The first had cost £14, the second £10, the third, which was got on the 4th of June, and which occurs in a list of arms got for the tournament, only cost £4, but perhaps it was that “lang culveryn” on which 42s. more was expended in varnishing it and gilding the end—the butt end presumably, and the “twich plaith,” which is said to have been half a foot long.¹ This gun must have been fired from a portable stand, as is seen in many old pictures of military subjects. Within a month two more culverins were purchased² at a little higher price than the last, the pair costing £9 16s. All these guns meant a corresponding supply of gunpowder; there are many notices of its manufacture, and later on a regular powder mill was set up in Edinburgh. Meanwhile the manufacture does not seem to have been on a large scale, and the powder for the culverins seems to have cost something to make, as Hans charged 22s. 6d. for 4½ lbs.³ There is a curious entry on the 4th July 1508, when Curroure the goldsmith seems to have supplied a gun to the King; perhaps this was the silver gun of which we read on the 28th of July, when a "measure" for regulating the charge of powder was supplied to it.⁴ Whether the King lost conceit of culverin shooting as time went on we do not know, but in the later series of accounts there is little or no mention of it. The King certainly continued to shoot, but it was with the more primitive weapons of bows and arrows. Firearms were destined for more serious purposes than mere amusement.

It was in 1511 that gun-making on a large scale was commenced in the Castle of Edinburgh. Native talent was found not to be sufficient, and artificers had to be imported. We read of Gervase, gunner, and John Garnere, Steven Davenneis and Jacat, "melters," besides other assistants, including a wright and a smith.¹ Jacat, we know, came from Tours, and all of them were brought from France, as they got payment for extra expenses incurred by them while waiting for a ship and a fair wind at the port of Dieppe. Jacob and Hans, the Flemings, were already in Scotland. Large quantities of iron and other metal were purchased in France and Flanders, and delivered at the Castle. The result was the casting of "ane gret cannoun callit the Necar," in the making of which 1,819 lbs. of brass were used.² One hundred and forty-four "gun stanis" were imported,³ and later on a powder mill arrived at Dundee, and was carried from there to Edinburgh.⁴ Six "bemys culveringis" were brought from Campvere to Leith, and 3,018 "pellokis" or cannon balls weighing about 20 lbs. apiece were purchased for upwards of £63.⁵ There were other purchases of a similar kind; 4,023 "gun stanis" of iron of the largest size, each weighing 33½ lbs., were got, and 263 smaller ones of 15 lbs. A little later, in June 1512, there was a further importation of 436 iron balls, each weighing 36 lbs., and 203 "pellokis" for the large culverins of 16 lbs.¹ There was, indeed, no stint of expenditure on ammunition and metal for guns. The next month William Brounhill brings home 316 stones of gun metal, $2\frac{1}{2}$ tons of copper, and 9 tons of cannon balls.²

Meanwhile the casting of guns went on apace in Edinburgh Castle under the superintendence of Robert Borthwick, "master meltar." On the last day of January 1511-12 the King paid a visit to the foundry, and gave £4 4s. in "propines" to the Dutch smiths, Scots smiths, masons, wrights, gunners, powder men, and other workmen in the Castle.³ In June 1512 another visit was paid, Gervase "and his marrowis gunnares" getting 28s. in drinksilver, while we learn that they had some assistance in the form of unskilled labour, 14s. being given at the same time to "pure bodeis that helpit to melt." On the 20th June some Leith carters were sent with ten carts to the Castle of Threave to bring back two great guns; it is evident that all the available artillery was to be concentrated in Edinburgh in case of its being wanted for an expedition into England. There is not much further reference to the guns in the main text of the accounts. In November 1512 we find Thomas Kincaid, the Constable of Edinburgh Castle, getting £30 for the purchase of copper, and we meet with a Wolf Urnebrig who gets a monthly wage of £4 4s. for manufacturing gunpowder.¹

But when we turn to the Appendices containing the more detailed Accounts of the Master of the Works, which were afterwards summarised in the Accounts of the Treasurer, we find many most interesting items relating to the artillery. By August 1512 some of the guns with which the artificers in the Castle had been so busy were ready, so we find three great guns being taken from the Castle to Leith, ready to be put on board the Great Michael, or some of the other ships which were there waiting for their equipment. It may be noted that each gun required six carts to bear it.² In December, 26s. were spent on iron to make handspikes or "gavelokis" for them. On the 19th of the same month two more guns were shipped "in haste."³ Meanwhile the cannon foundry in the Castle was doing good work. In March 1513 there were ten men working under Borthwick at the melting of the metal besides four smiths, two men being under a Scottish smith and one under a Flemish. Long poles of fir wood were purchased to stir the molten metal with, and the furnaces were, of course, kept going night and day.⁴ It is not necessary to allude in detail to the various purchases of different kinds of metal for the guns and other necessary appliances. These will all be found set forth very carefully in the accounts. One iron gun at least was taken in hand by the Scottish smith.¹ The others were as usual cast in bronze. While the "meltars" worked at the guns, Wolf was no less busy in his department of the powder mill, and an array of carpenters were engaged in making the ammunition waggons which were to accompany the guns when they were ready to set out. Barcar, the smith, put iron tyres on twenty pairs of great wheels for them, and was also responsible for the making of spades, shovels, handspikes, and such like articles to accompany the guns on their journey, not so much probably for entrenching purposes as to enable the roads over which they were to be taken to be made passable for such heavy and cumbrous machines. Harness of all kinds, both for oxen and horses, was prepared, and tallow and grease to facilitate the free working of the axles were not forgotten. It was, indeed, a very fully equipped park of artillery that proceeded to set out on Wednesday the 17th of August 1513 on their fateful expedition.

Pitscottie tells us that the number of men to be marched to Flodden under command of the King amounted to 100,000, and that the artillery consisted of thirty large guns and as many field pieces. We may safely put down all these numbers as much exaggerated. In the accounts now before us there is only a record of seventeen guns in all—five big cannon, two “gros culverins,” four “culverins pikmoyane,” and six “culverins moyane.” They were all under the direction of Robert Borthwick, who had so much to do with their manufacture. The old historian above mentioned tells us that Borthwick had cast seven cannon in Edinburgh Castle, and that they were called the seven sisters, presumably from their being all alike in shape and size; but the accounts, unfortunately, are against this picturesque touch. Borthwick did no doubt cast many guns, and went to England in charge of them. If they had been used as he wished, as he implored the King, we are told, on his bended knees to do,¹ the fate of the day might have been different. But James’s infatuated obstinacy threw away that chance as it did others. Let us see meanwhile in detail what the number and equipment of these guns really were.

The army, as we know, assembled on the Borough Muir, but the artillery does not appear to have gone there. On the day above mentioned five cannon were “put on gait” and drawn by men to the Nether Bow in St. Mary’s Wynd, where they remained all night watched by twelve men.² On the morrow they started on their journey south. The first cannon must have been smaller than the others; it had a team of oxen provided by the Captain of the Castle, with eight drivers, and as each man drove four oxen this would only make thirty-two oxen in all; the other two cannon were each drawn by thirty-six oxen with nine drivers, the teams being furnished by beasts partly provided by the King himself and partly by private individuals, among whom may be mentioned "the laird of Dunnys," the Prior of Whithorn, and the Provost of Coldstream. They had ropes attached before and behind to keep them "at upwith and dounewith," that is, to help the oxen going up a hill or to put a drag on when going down hill. Each gun was accompanied by a corps of twenty men, with spades, shovels, and picks to level the road in different places and generally to assist their progress; they may possibly also have been intended to make entrenchments when the time came. Each man—both drivers and pioneers—got a shilling a day while in Scotland and sixteen-pence while in England; fourteen days' wages were paid them at the former rate and eight at the latter. On the 19th August the remaining guns got under weigh. There were two "gros culveringis," the first drawn by thirty-six oxen and with a similar body of men at the cannon; the second gun of the same type had only thirty-two oxen. There were four culverins "pikmoyane," each drawn by sixteen oxen, with four drivers and ten pioneers. There were six smaller pieces, each with eight oxen and a horse and six pioneers. A crane was taken, probably for the purpose of slinging the guns when required, and there were four score of "foir oxen," or fore oxen, which may have been used for assisting the regular teams in any specially difficult place. The "gun stanis" were carried in creels or baskets on the backs of twenty-eight horses, but some were taken in carts.¹ There were at least a dozen carts with gunpowder, and the "burneledaris" of Edinburgh, probably persons who dug the ditches and drains or sunk the wells in connection with the primitive water supply of the town, furnished two cartfuls of spades, shovels, picks, and mattocks. Robert Borthwick had twenty-six men under his more immediate command in connection with the working of the guns; and Barcar and several other smiths took their tools, together with iron and coals and probably anvils, to execute any work that might be found necessary on the guns. The smiths appear to have got two shillings a day, a much higher rate of pay than the usual.

The difficulties of transporting such an amount of artillery and ammunition so far south as England must have been considerable. The route taken was probably over Soutra Hill to Coldstream, a distance of forty-eight miles. James, we are told,² entered England on the 22nd August, but as the last of the guns did not leave Edinburgh before the 20th, the King with characteristic impatience must have pushed on considerably in advance of the heavier portion of his army. This indeed is reflected in the accounts, from which we see that he did not even wait for his standards to be ready, a man having to wait on their completion and bring them after the King "in haist, that nycht that the Kingis Grace departit furth of Edinburgh."¹ Even so late as the 19th of August we find the purchase of a stand of harness for the King noted; it was bought from Sir David Guthrie, who only got an obligation for the payment of it—ready money was not, we may suppose, very accessible at the time. But the guns, or some of them at least, must have come up with commendable quickness, as they were probably employed in the reduction of the Castles of Etal and Wark and Norham—the siege of the latter occupied five days, and it surrendered on the 29th August. One incident in the journey of the guns is narrated in the accounts, which is not without interest. At Dalkeith an ox which formed part of one of the teams had the misfortune to break its neck by being run over by one of the cannon. Another was bought in its place at the cost of 32s., and the deceased ox was given to the men to eat—a part of the commissariat which was doubtless duly enjoyed.

Before closing these remarks on the preparations for Flodden it may be noted that there are many other interesting details concerning them in the accounts. We have, for instance, the charges for making the tents, some of leather, others of canvas, and a body of forty men were employed to pitch and strike them. The banners and standard were made at the last moment. There were two banners of St. Andrew and St. Margaret, each made of four ells of blue taffety, while the King's standard was of red taffety and three ells in length, which is shorter than might have been supposed, as a King's standard to be borne in war is said by the old writers to be nine yards long. All these flags were heavily fringed, and for the convenience of carriage were inclosed in leather cases.¹

There is a curious incident recorded in the Appendix in relation to the Irish Chieftain O'Donell. We have seen that he was in Scotland in July 1513, the Earl of Argyll getting £50 for his expenses.² There was some idea of creating a diversion in Ireland which might occupy the attention of the English King. The chief was hospitably entertained on his visit. The sum paid to Argyll must have been for the expenses of his journey. We now find that he himself got £40 "in plakkis" for his costs while in Edinburgh, and a present, when he took his departure, of £160.³ But more was done: a big gun and a culverin, with proportionate ammunition, was sent, as far as Glasgow, probably with the intention of being shipped to Ireland. With them went seven quarriers "for the undermining of wallis," which speaks of a projected siege. In addition to all this cavalcade there were sixteen "tume" or empty carts sent, which were destined to bring home wine expected to be landed on the west coast from France. What hitch occurred we do not know: perhaps it was felt that the guns could not be spared at such a critical time. But certain it is that the guns never got to Ireland, as on the 14th of August more carts were dispatched to Glasgow to bring them home again, and we are told that they took ten days to come home, so that they would not arrive in Edinburgh till the 24th, probably too late to be of assistance to the army, which had by that time started for England.¹

MISCELLANEOUS.

The volume of accounts is necessarily of so large a size that space forbids more than a very few subjects being touched upon in the Preface. The student of history and manners will find much to interest him in the various items detailed in the following pages. One or two can only be briefly referred to. Life at Court went on very much as it had done in previous years, but many little details are new. For the first time in the accounts we have information of the King's winnings at cards—all the former entries referred to his losses. We are told, however, that he once won twenty-six ducats; but with characteristic generosity they were incontinently given away to a Spaniard whose ship had been captured by Macleod, who no doubt was always on the look-out for such sendings of Providence in the Western Isles. Another testimony, if any were wanted, to the King's kindness of heart is found in an entry on 30th April 1508, when three shillings were given "to ane pure barne that tuke the King by the hand." May we see in this the Royal power of touching for scrofula? The superstition widely obtained for centuries. Laurentius, physician to Henry IV. of France, claims that the power commenced with Clovis I., while others say that it was of English growth, commencing with Edward the Confessor and descending only to such foreign sovereigns as could show an alliance with the Royal family of England. However this may be, it is a most graphic incident to meet with in the midst of a series of accounts; and even if we dismiss the idea of its having the medical significance to which allusion has been made, it shows the accessibility and kindliness which made access to the Scottish Sovereign open to a poor Scottish child.

We have not so many notices as previously of the King's pets, but the marmoset from Calicut was a new addition to the Royal menagerie,¹ and there is a notice of a "must" (probably an animal of a similar kind to the "must cat" mentioned in previous volumes) being brought to the King by a friar of Ferrara, for which he got the large sum of £70.²

The King's table during the period of these accounts was augmented by some handsome plate both of silver and gold, details of which will be found in pp. 321 and 532; in the latter page it is mentioned that for the "bostering" of two gold trenchers there was delivered to the goldsmith the silver of the greatest broken "beriall pig." It is difficult to say what this means: a "pig" is usually an earthenware, not a metal vessel; but it may be permitted to hazard a guess that the "beriall pig" may have been a receptacle for ashes or other relics of a deceased person.

The tournament alluded to as having taken place at the end of May 1508³ was given when the Lord of Aubigny came to Scotland. It was very much a repetition of the one given in 1507, but rather on a grander scale. Pitscottie gives a long account of it, and says it lasted for forty days, which is probably a gross exaggeration. He says also that at the end there were "bancats" given at Holyrood for three days, and at each banquet a farce or play was acted, together with conjuring tricks. In the more trustworthy, if less amusing, accounts we only read of "the bancat," "the play," "the dans," which points to only one entertainment having been given. It was no doubt done in very good style, but there is no hint to corroborate Pitscottie's marvellous story about "ane clwdd" which descended from the roof of the Hall and "cleikkit up the blak lady."¹ In accordance with a rather absurd custom of the time the housings of the horses of the knights in the tournament and their own servants seem to have been ornamented with letters, which probably had some significance, as we find Piers the painter getting no less than £5 12s. 6d. for cutting them out of velvet.²

¹P. 117.

³P. 119.

It must be left for the diligent student of the accounts to cull for himself the items which most interest him. We must now take leave of the Accounts of the Treasurers of James IV., which have filled three volumes of the present series. One cannot read them without feeling that the Scottish nation was full of life and vigour in those days. It was not so poor as it afterwards became; the country was on the whole perfectly safe to travel through, and the roads must have been quite fairly good, certainly sufficiently so for the needs of the inhabitants. The population, from the glimpses we get of it, seem to have lived in tolerable comfort, probably more comfortably than they did in later times. The turbulent members of society were kept in order, and the King's writ ran in most parts, at all events, of his dominions, and when there was any difficulty about it the King's strong hand was sure to be felt ere long. The nobles, whose internecine quarrels worked more to the detriment of Scotland than anything else in her history, were kept wonderfully quiet during James's reign. A brilliant and gay Court, if it did not elevate the moral tone of the commons, must at least have raised the standard of taste and the appreciation of art in the kingdom, while literature and science—so far as the latter was understood—received Royal recognition and encouragement. Through all the period the commanding personality of the King stands out conspicuous. A man with many faults, which were to be bitterly expiated, but also with many virtues; brave and chivalrous to a degree, he won the hearts of his people by his condescension and amiability, while his position in relation to the politics of Europe caused him to be courted by foreign Powers in a way which no Scottish Sovereign had previously experienced. Personally, he must have been a charming man; he had the "Byronic" note in him, but with all the romance and waywardness which formed such integral parts of his character, he did not neglect the more practical issues of life, as is shown by the enthusiasm and energy with which he threw himself into the work of fitting out his navy and raising the efficiency of the military service of his kingdom. His features have been preserved to us on the canvas of Holbein,¹ though the picture has been so repainted as to convey very little impression of its original execution. The face is rather a sad one, with large and lustrous eyes, high cheek bones, and a large but firm mouth, the cheeks clean shaved. In his hand, large, slender, and sinewy, he holds a flower, apparently a Marguerite, an allusion to his Queen. The dress is dark, and not particularly becoming. There is another and more interesting portrait by Mytens in Keir House; in this the King is attired more as one would expect he would be. He wears a soft black cap with a gold brooch in front; a white shirt adorned at the throat with a border of gems appears at the breast and wrists; the doublet and robe are of scarlet slashed with cloth of gold, the latter being trimmed with brown fur at the breast and sleeves; on the left fist of the King is perched a peregrine falcon with a leash attached to the jesses turned round three of the fingers, while the right hand holds, pressed against the side, a lilac hawk's rest or "block," decorated with dark green fillets. The face, seen in the three-quarters to the left, is exceedingly individual in features and expression, the cheeks shaven, the protruding upper lip showing the slight stubble of a dark moustache, the eyes greyish hazel, the eyebrows dark brown, and the brown hair falling in large thick masses over the shoulders.¹

I have thought it not inappropriate to close the series of Prefaces dealing with the accounts of this monarch, with a description of his personal appearance as it has been preserved to us. I take leave of him with regret as I would part with an intimate personal friend.

It only remains for me to acknowledge with grateful thanks the assistance which has been rendered me by several persons in the preparation of this volume. Especially do I owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. John Scott, C.B., whose intimate knowledge of everything relating to ship-building and ships both ancient and modern has enabled me to throw light on many an expression which would otherwise have remained obscure. He has been most kind in reading the proofs of the accounts which relate to the naval preparations. It is, perhaps, superfluous to mention the name of Mr. Maitland Thomson, Curator of the Historical Department, as one to whom due acknowledgment should be made for much kindly help; no person who has trodden the thorny paths of Records can have failed to profit by his guidance. To the Rev. John Anderson, the Assistant Curator, is due more than a mere formal word of thanks. He is ever full of suggestion and resource, and ever ready to place them at the disposal of the importunate editor. My assistant, Mr. P. J. H. Mackenzie, has been most painstaking in all the work which has devolved on him, and Mr. Joseph Davidson, of the Advocates' Library, is responsible for the Index, not the least valuable and necessary part of a book like the present.
